

Racializing “Oriental” Manliness: From Colonial Contexts to Cologne

Zuher Jazmati

University of Marburg, Germany

Nina Studer

University of Zurich, Geneva

ISLAMOPHOBIA STUDIES JOURNAL
VOLUME XX, NO. X Season 2017, PP. 87-100.

Published by:

Islamophobia Research and Documentation Project,
Center for Race and Gender, University of California, Berkeley

Disclaimer:

Statements of fact and opinion in the articles, notes, perspectives, etc. in the Islamophobia Studies Journal are those of the respective authors and contributors. They are not the expression of the editorial or advisory board and staff. No representation, either expressed or implied, is made of the accuracy of the material in this journal and ISJ cannot accept any legal responsibility or liability for any errors or omissions that may be made. The reader must make his or her own evaluation of the accuracy and appropriateness of those materials.

Racializing “Oriental” Manliness: From Colonial Contexts to Cologne

Zuher Jazmati

University of Marburg, Germany

Nina Studer

University of Zurich, Geneva

ABSTRACT: We propose a co-authored, interdisciplinary paper examining the durability of Islamophobic stereotypes connected to men from the MENA region and their specific forms of “manliness”. We argue that European notions of “Oriental” manliness – covering all ethnic and religious groups from this region – were strangely homogenized and static: the colonized “Oriental” manliness was constructed as the “primitive” counterpart to an idealized form of European masculinity. The significant markers of “Oriental” manliness, as defined in the 19th century, were still essentially the same in the 1960s, when Frantz Fanon wrote that his contemporaries had solidified (but not founded) the idea of North African men as “born slackers, born liars, born thieves, born criminals”.¹ The events in Cologne on New Year’s Eve 2015 went viral worldwide. Right-wing groups felt vindicated when the public discourse seemed to confirm their narrative of North African, sexually uncontrolled men. A lot of the media coverage following the events in Cologne overlapped with right-wing (and colonial) notions of wild North African men, who are in Europe in order to sexually threaten the white female body. Following the assaults in Cologne, this anxiety was not just limited to women in Germany, but extended across much of Europe. To analyze this alleged durability, we propose to divide our paper into a historical part, which will give a short overview over the formulaic metaphors, images and knowledge production of colonized “Oriental” manliness. In our contemporary analyses, we will trace the harmful longevity of these colonial stereotypes, from the Victorian epoch to the sensationalist reports following the recent incidents in Cologne. We will use pictures from German (and other European) public media depicting the incidents in Cologne and analyze how they reproduced the longstanding anti-Muslim-racist stereotypical image of and knowledge on the North African masculine subject.

Keywords: colonialism, media studies, gender, violence, critical masculinity

INTRODUCTION

The media's reaction to the events in Cologne on New Year's Eve 2015 used a very specific, aggressive and highly pejorative imagery: a vast proportion of both the German and the wider European press depicted all Muslim men as a potential threat to the safety of European women. The various pictures used to illustrate the outrage felt by both journalists and audience immediately after the events were very similar in many ways: not only was the metaphor of the images often the same, but many journals also chose to use racial color codes and to contextualize the pictures with a specific derogatory vocabulary. The imagery presented to the readers could be expected to be truly understood only if journalists and the readers shared a preexisting understanding about "how Muslim men function". Contemporary European notions of "how Muslim men function", of their specific brand of "Oriental" manliness so to speak, are often strangely homogenized and static and have a hidden colonial connotation: during the colonial past, the colonized "Oriental" manliness was constructed as being the "primitive" counterpart to an idealized European masculinity, and this racial baggage and its manifold consequences have yet to be deconstructed in the public mind, as shown by the reaction to the events in Cologne analyzed in this article. As such, the media response to the events in Cologne can be used to show the strange durability of Islamophobic stereotypes specifically connected to men from the MENA region and to their specific forms of "manliness". This article therefore seeks to analyze contemporary Islamophobia by looking for the colonial inheritance of the imagery presented in the immediate aftermath of the events.

The sensational imagery used in the media after the incidents of Cologne must have been very familiar to any historian working on gender issues in the colonial Maghreb, but the general readership and probably also most of the journalists who put these shocking reports together were undoubtedly not fully aware of the colonial heritage hidden in these pictures. The significant characteristics of “Oriental” manliness, as defined in the 19th century, were still essentially the same in the 1960s, when Frantz Fanon wrote that his contemporaries had solidified the idea of North African men as “born slackers, born liars, born thieves, born criminals”.² We would like to argue that, in many ways, these same pejorative characteristics still define “Oriental” manliness today. This can be seen in the fact that the events in Cologne on New Year’s Eve 2015 went viral worldwide. Right-wing groups felt vindicated: the public discourse seemed to confirm their narrative of North Africans as sexually uncontrolled and potentially uncontrollable men. A lot of the media coverage following the events in Cologne overlapped with right-wing (and colonial) notions of wild and savage North African men, who only come to Europe to sexually harass the white women. After Cologne, the media helped create a sense of anxiety about the safety of women, which not only focused on women living in Germany, but on white women in Europe in general.

To analyze this alleged durability of stereotypes about “Oriental” manliness, we propose to divide our paper into a historical part, which will give a short overview of the formulaic metaphors, images and knowledge production of colonized “Oriental” manliness, and a contemporary part, which will trace the harmful longevity of these colonial stereotypes, from the 19th century to the sensationalist reports following the incidents in Cologne. In this second part, we will use pictures from the German (and other European) public media, which covered the incidents in Cologne, and analyze how they reproduced the longstanding anti-Muslim/racist stereotypical image of and knowledge on the North African masculine subject.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Hands of men of color grabbing at a vulnerable naked white female body – such pictures cannot be seen detached from their historical context. Despite being used 185 years after the beginning of the military conquest of Algeria, these exact images represent one of the biggest fears described in sources about life in the colonial Maghreb in both the 19th and the first half of the 20th century. They show a fear which deeply influenced the way French authors wrote about the North African masculinity. It should be added here that these pictures express a universal fear among European settlers in practically all colonial settings and that it is only the specific context of the Cologne events that imply that the hands in these pictures belong to North Africans. Without the context of Cologne, these hands could belong to a variety of demonized masculinities of color.

The 19th-century French descriptions of North African men were by no means homogeneous – French travelers, settlers, soldiers, doctors and early anthropologists described different classes in their texts, and wrote about individuals from different “races”, origins and levels of education. Yet these various important differences among North African men often seemed to disappear when they were directly or indirectly compared with the French men. It is important to note that the French colonial authors, who were mostly men, negotiated their own masculine identity through inherent comparisons between themselves and the North African men they described in their publications. In this context, the complicated issue of French masculinity, fractured for example along the lines of class and origin, physicality and political affiliation, could be constructed as strangely homogeneous. This does obviously not mean that the different variations of French masculinity were erased in the colonial context, but in this constant inherent comparison with North Africans, French masculinity was seen to be both hegemonic and normative. French men, who might have been seen as not fulfilling the ideals of the hegemonic masculinity in France for whatever reason, overcame this when compared with North African men. Therefore, North African men were always portrayed as the subordinated othered minority³ in the source material – some were not masculine enough, some were too masculine, but most North African men were masculine in a distinctly “wrong way”.

This “wrongness” of the subordinated North African masculinity showed itself most distinctly in the peril North African men were seen to represent. Almost all of the colonial accounts mentioned at some point the perceived threat emanating from the Oriental masculinity: all North African men were seen to be potentially dangerous. They were consistently racially portrayed as primitives who could not control their own emotions and whose culture fostered extreme reactions of any kind: extreme customs, extreme beliefs, and extreme behavior.

It should be added here that the colonial authors during the early colonial period trying to define North African masculinity also adhered to contemporary theories of racial hierarchies. These authors often felt compelled to point out that the North African version of primitivism was not as backward as that of, for example, sub-Saharan Africans – an idea codified by the ethnologist Lucien Lévy-Bruhl in his 1922 book on “primitive mentality”.⁴ In stark contrast with sub-Saharan primitivism, North African primitivism was defined by the idea of “degeneration”. Many colonial authors pointed out that there had once been a high level of civilization in the region that had degenerated under the influence of Islam: North Africans were, as the colonial authors saw it, essentially stuck in the Middle Ages – a notion that is still very present in contemporary coverage on the region. This idea of North Africans as being one step above other colonized populations on the evolutionary ladder became much less pronounced during the 20th century, and, by the end of the colonial period, “North African primitivism” was almost undistinguishable from “real primitivism”.

The key difference between French and North African masculinity can be found in this question of a primitive violence inherent to North Africans. Violence on its own was not seen to be “unmasculine”, so to speak – the French certainly felt the need to reassert their masculinity after their defeat in the Napoleonic wars, and the military conquest of Algeria and the subjugation of the region and its peoples gave them the opportunity for this. The French military conquest of North Africa and the subsequent settler colonialism were certainly a celebration of an idealized masculine violence.⁵ A certain kind of aggressive behavior was, therefore, part of the French normative ideal of masculinity. But it was a justified, civilized, controlled, almost a moderate form of violence – one that was allegedly only used to “civilize”, that could be restrained and one that was, ideally, never directed toward women. It was an imagined violence of war and duels and heroism that obviously had very little to do with reality.⁶

Male North African violence, on the other hand, was seen to be an inherited, shared and deeply primitive character trait, which meant that every North African man could be perceived to potentially be a hereditary, uncontrollable aggressor toward everyone around him. The danger posed by such men was perceived to be at once physical (as shown, for example, through both everyday criminality and the armed resistance against French military occupation) and psychological, as it was often assumed that North African men possessed a more aggressive, if also more primitive, virility than the French.

French fear of North African men was channeled through the image of the “Algerian with a knife”:⁷ the North African man, who murdered good French settlers (and also other North Africans, especially North African women) in a fit of rage, often, as the colonial narrative insisted, under the influence of hashish or strong, cheap alcohol.⁸ Muslim women, on the other hand, were usually portrayed as meek and distinctly non-violent victims in this context. This male propensity toward violence was usually explained through both the lack of control and the lack of moderation that was, in the eyes of most French observers, intrinsic to North Africans. It was thus believed that situations in which a French man would have been able to remain in control of his emotions would turn into tragedies when it involved a North African man. The psychiatrist Antoine Porot and his student Don Côme Arrii described this fear of an uncontrollable North African male violence in an article on “Criminal Impulsivity in the Algerian Native” in 1932:

More modestly, we would like to research the reasons of a phenomenon {which is} truly particular to this race: the frequency of criminal impulsivity. The considerable proportion of attacks, in the judicial statistics, is striking, and we can say that nine-tenths of the {court cases} of expertise concerning {the criminal responsibility of} natives entrusted to psychiatrists relate to murders or attempted murders. The native plays with the baton, with the knife or with guns with an easiness, a promptitude and a savagery, which often lead to death. It is, very often, close relatives, father, mother, brother and especially wife, who are struck, and, in a certain number of cases, there are several victims of the impulsive fury of the murderer.⁹

Within the colonial discourse about North African masculinity, the much feared North African violence was often strangely sexualized in vocabulary, metaphors and the contexts it was put into. Among other things, French colonial authors often focused on the sexual violence perpetrated by North African men against both North African women and other North African men. The French doctor and criminologist Adolphe Kocher, for example, described such cases of violent sexuality in his 1883 dissertation, before stating,

We do not want to excuse the {actions of the} Arab, but we can only point out that what is to us a monstrous crime, is to him a very natural action: {such as} rape within in a marriage with all its brutalities, to cite only one example.¹⁰

This idea of sexual violence being something completely normal, something intrinsic to North African manliness even, was seen to be one of the main markers of difference between the colonizers and the colonized.

This conviction of the existence of a North African propensity toward sexual violence obviously colored French perceptions of North African behavior toward the French. The embodiment of French fear in North Africa was, even more than “the Algerian with a knife”, the image of an animal-like Muslim man attacking, kidnapping, enslaving and/or raping a pure, innocent French woman, even if this fear was not often explicitly written about in the source material. The need, however, to protect good European women from contact with North African men and thus from this form of violence was a driving motivation of the architecture of the French colonial project in North Africa. This conviction and the consequential need to protect European women at all costs from North African men were in line with what are called “black peril” panics in other African colonial contexts: sporadic outbreaks of panic about men of color raping white women.¹¹ Tellingly, it was not actual cases of “interracial rape” that sparked the “black peril” outrages, but fear of both such events and their outcomes. This has to be seen in the context of the widespread racial prejudice of the time, which allowed European men to have some kinds of sexual intercourse with North African women (the highly exoticized “native” prostitutes, for example), but constructed all potential sexual contact between North African men and European women as only the result of sexual violence.

However, it was not only the settlers who claimed that North African men behaved in a way unbecoming to “true” (normative and French) masculinity toward all groups in the colonial context. The fear of sexually aggressive North Africans threatening white women was given a quasi-scientific justification by what is commonly called the École d’Alger: Being first written about by travelers and settlers, these definitions of a violent North African masculinity were taken up by medico-legal experts, who justified them by translating them into a scientific vocabulary in the first half of the 20th century. Frantz Fanon argued that preexisting notions of Muslim manliness were solidified by the writings of his colleagues at the *École d’Alger*¹² – the neuropsychiatric University of Algiers under the leadership of the aforementioned psychiatrist Antoine Porot. The École d’Alger dominated the French psychiatric discourse in the first half of the 20th century, and their theories about both pathology and normality of North Africans spread far beyond just an expert audience: their theories, which had taken up and justified many of the settlers’ prejudices against North Africans, were read by a broad audience and thus had a profound influence on the image the French had of North Africans, both in North Africa and in France. Many historians have argued that these basic assumptions of the École d’Alger about North African men – linking immoderation and lack of control with sexuality, violence and general deviancy, creating the theory of an inherent “criminal impulsivity” in North African men – still heavily influence our contemporary perceptions, as, for example, historian and psychiatrist Robert Berthelmer emphasized in an article on Fanon in 2006.¹³

It is undeniable that the image of North African virility being intrinsically violent and dangerous survived long into the 20th century and found its way across the Mediterranean with the Maghrebi immigrants. As mentioned above, we think that these colonial ideas about North African masculinity can be seen very well in the media reaction to the events in Cologne.

THE IMPORTANCE OF COLOGNE

Media – as a space and actor of a creation of publicity – affects what is broadcasted with respect to what is worth reporting and appears relevant. That is also linked to ways of representation of how the media reports specific topics, persons, or events. Meanings are negotiated through language and images; definitions, wordings, and visual presentations define how a certain issue is expressed. The conventions of the discursive practice call up speaking positions and decide who is able to speak and who is not. In entanglements with other discourses and together with media texts, certain frames and meanings can be presented through which positions of actors can be dealt with.¹⁴

To analyze the imagery presented by the media after the events in Cologne with an academic technique, a methodological approach needs to be introduced and taken into consideration. The method of a political image analysis that arose from art sciences, also known as Iconology, can be a suitable instrument for the visual and humanistic communication research. The central goal of the humanistic work in that method was that of revealing the hidden content of meaning of the visual portrayals. Above all, the “meanings” and the “statements” were relying on “assumptions”. Thus, they are too complex to be defined empirically, and the exact content cannot be precisely filtered using the Iconology method. The unambiguity of a central statement that is hidden in an image cannot be guaranteed. Defining the contents of the image analysis, Claudia Wolf speaks of an “associative logic [...] that needs to be differentiated diametral and that is more complicated to reach with empirical methods”¹⁵. The contents of meaning and statements and therefore also the images’ communicated intentions to observers are mainly ascertained subjectively and therefore are not of an obvious or coherent nature.

The renowned researchers Gunther Kress and Theo van Leeuwen compare in their work “The Grammar of Visual Design” the language of images and words. They define which or how rules (grammar) can add up to a complete statement (meaningful whole). With regard to the languages of images, Kress and van Leeuwen concentrated on how humans, spaces, and other things in images are combined to create the meaningful whole that leads to a “statement”,¹⁶ generating at the same time a “meaning” and producing a “reality” that can be perceived as a documentation evidence of an event. Thus, images can also be seen as an established source of specialized evidence¹⁷: “Describing a ‘language’ is describing what people do with words, or images, or music”.¹⁸ According to Kress and van Leeuwen, these meaningful expressions in images create “volumes” and “vectors”: “We shall distinguish between volumes and vectors, between being and acting”.¹⁹ They asked themselves how “similarities” and “sameness” can be expressed pictorially; how “actions” are told and how “actors” and “goals of action” can be distinguished visually.²⁰ The formal parlance of an image that Kress and van Leeuwen count – namely, activity, passivity, dynamic, and statics – for different action participants and action forms build up the basic structure of the communicative comprehension.²¹ In that sense, the participants are the “volumes” or “masses” which each own “weight” or “gravitation pull”. Processes in pictures are called “vectors”, “tensions”, or “dynamic forces”.²²

In this part of this article, we will get deeper into the concrete application of this method. This will be achieved through an analysis of the selected material, in order to clarify how an image can be perceived from a humanistic point of view. The iconological interpretation will be helpful in approaching the action of an image and its symbolic meaning. Three cover pictures of different magazines and newspapers depicting the events of Cologne will be used and analyzed below.

FOCUS

The German weekly magazine Focus is one of the best-known newspapers in Germany and is considered to be among the politically right-centered media. The magazine has about 5.09 million readers in Germany, so it can be classified as one of Germany's most influential political medial opinion leaders.

The cover picture of the magazine Focus presents a naked, white, slim, blonde woman. She holds her right arm in front of her breasts and her left hand to cover her vulva. The face ends above the nose, not showing the women's eyes while her mouth is half open. Her body has multiple dark imprints of hands on her naked body. The photo of the woman is black and white, while a red bar crosses her body at the level of the breasts. With grand white letters on the red bar, the headline of the magazine says: "Women Accuse". On a second smaller bar, the subheading of the title says²³: "After the Sex-Attacks of Migrants".²⁴ On a third red bar placed at the level of the woman's vulva, the last subheading asks the question: "Are we still tolerant or already blind?".²⁵ Over her right shoulder, a headline reads "Exclusive: What really happened on New Year's Eve in Cologne".²⁶ The complete picture takes about four fifths of the magazine cover.

The three red bars that randomly cross the cover picture remind us of a crime scene protection tape. The woman is surrounded by the tape while she – in black and white – represents the victim of a crime. The criminal act (the events on New Year's Eve) is focused on the woman's body. As Lalon Sander analyzes the picture from a critical feminist approach, she writes that "not only is the woman naked, but her vulnerability is eroticized, her mouth is slightly opened. That is especially bitter, as the title in itself, therefore ripping off the clothes of the women".²⁷ The woman's white, pure, and teasing body appears as a stark contradiction to the black, dirty, male hands on her body. The assumed racial component of the picture is supported by combining the photo with the text on the illustration. The allegedly liberal society is made responsible for the attacks on New Year's Eve by the accusing question: "After the Sex-Attacks of Migrants: Are we still tolerant or already blind?"²⁸

It can be assumed that the magazine makes an implicit connection between "migrants" and the so called "sex attacks". The question implies that the magazine already knew about this connection before New Year's Eve and that the rape attacks were consequently predictable and avoidable. Anyone who is not "blind" should have known that attacks like these would eventually happen. Liberal and therefore blind people are made responsible for the attacks. The magazine does not speak of "rapists" but creates a collective guilt by generally speaking of "migrants". This link almost seems to be a natural conclusion, which clearly gives the cover picture a racist tone. The text-image-link turns the perpetrators from individuals into a homogeneous perpetrator group. Thus, the perpetrators are defined as "the other" ("migrants") and sexism and sexual violence is culturalized and even racialized.

SÜDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG

The next cover image on the attacks on New Year's Eve that we will analyze was published by the Süddeutsche Zeitung. According to the Information Community for the Assessment of the Circulation of Media, the daily newspaper has an everyday spread of 369,117 readers;²⁹ therefore, it can also be classified as one of Germany's most influential newspapers with respect to knowledge and opinion production on a daily basis.

This image shows a black background and the lower part of a female body in white in the middle of the picture. The inner frames of the female body are contoured by a black right arm that is about to touch the genitals of the woman. The outer part of the body is framed by the black background.

The image plays with basically two classic racist stereotypes. The first one involves the black hand that almost touches the vulva of the white female body. The white body appears to be pure, innocent, and inactive while the black arm is actively grabbing. The arm represents a danger for the white body that needs to be protected from it. The old tradition of that colonial image seems obvious, yet it is shocking that the racist stereotype and image of the sexually uncontrollable, wild, irrational, black man can still be vivid on a cover page in Germany in 2016. The second racist message of the picture is less clear, but it is a logical consequence of how the colors of the cover image interact with social realities. The black hand is of the same color as the background, so the picture could suggest that black people are a threatening majority in German society. The many refugees who arrived in Germany in October 2015 were permanently named as "refugee waves" in the popular discourse. Blackness is everywhere on the picture, but what stands out, therefore what seems to be a minority, is the endangered white body. Another colonial image is played with here by giving the white body a subject and the black body an object status. The threatening blackness around the white body calls the observer of the image to action – to protect the white body, the blackness needs to be decreased. The perpetrator group is once again homogenized and even majoritized, while the public media debate focused on "solutions" that concerned the homogenized group: deportation as well as the tightening of the asylum law.³⁰

W SIECI

The last image we will analyze appears to be similar to the first one. Because the events of Cologne were broadcasted globally, it is important to also take non-German media sources into consideration. The question of how media channels in other countries reported the events is as important as how the German ones did. W Sieci is a Polish magazine with a weekly circulation of 178,797 sold copies.

The image shows a white woman at the forefront of the picture. The background is gray and appears irrelevant. She wears the European Union flag over her left shoulder, implying that it was taken violently off her right side. Six brown, hairy, male hands grab violently at the woman from all sides. She is surrounded by hands and by their sexual touches. Two hands grab both of her hands while another one tries to take off the rest of her dress (which clearly symbolizes Europe), two hands touch her around her hips, and one hand pulls her behind by her head. In front of the right side of her shoulder, the title of the magazine says, “Islamic rape in Europe”.³¹

The blonde woman who is being attacked by the six brown hands symbolizes that the attacks in Cologne are about more than just the attacks in the city on that specific day: as the woman is wearing a dress made of the European Union flag, it was clearly an attack on the entire European Union. Religious and longstanding values are being infiltrated and even destroyed by violent, brown men. The brown men – who, according to the title, in this case are “Muslims” – are foreign bodies from outside of Europe. With their violent behavior and dark-colored skin, they appear to be as non-compatible with Europe and, therefore, to not belong there. The racist imagery on the cover picture gives Europe a face, an expression, emotions, whereas Muslims are reduced to violent grabbing, sexist arms, who harass and attack the former. The pained and scared scream of the victim portrayed as blonde, female and European seems to urge the observer to act and do something against the (Muslim) refugees in Europe.

CONCLUSION

To conclude, we can say that the covers discussed in this article are the present-day equivalent of the “black peril” tales whispered to each other in settler colonies. They are the equivalent of colonial psychiatrists diagnosing the non-patient majority of North African men as compulsive violent criminals. They are the equivalent of the settler morality decreeing that all sexuality between North African men and European women necessarily must be the result of violence.

The prejudice against North African men, which was formed and cultivated during the colonization of the region but which survived after that, was expressed in the media’s reactions to the attacks on New Year’s Eve in Cologne in a very specific way. In the post-Cologne context, the normative and thus desirable masculinity is still the idealized, controlled European man – one that would never stoop to grabbing at a naked female body, but one that points out this behavior as foreign and unacceptable – and the immigrant men, all of them condemned as potential rapists on the covers of newspapers, are still seen to conform with colonial prejudices about a subordinated “Oriental” masculinity. North African men are still depicted as the same barbaric masses of potential criminals that the colonial settlers “protected” their women from. This discourse about “Oriental” masculinity, be it in the colonial context or in the post-Cologne media landscape, is based on a very classic fear of the other as dangerous and violent and primitive – but it also shows the underlying assumption that the “primitive” other, both the colonized and the immigrant North African, is, in a way, hypermasculine: more aggressive than a European man, especially more sexually aggressive, and maybe even more dominant.

The pictures discussed in this article were spread through right-wing blogs and websites. The slogan “Rapefugees not welcome” became a symbol of right-wing demonstrations and parties in Germany. The media reports on the events in Cologne and the popular reaction to both the events and the reports reduced refugees, migrants, and Muslims as a whole, to one long-suspected identity: they can only be violent, sexist attackers. The shift of everyday sexism to a specific phenomenon that can be observed only in refugees is dangerous on many levels: on the one hand, sexism is trivialized as it becomes a topic for only one specific event when the reality is that in 2015, 331 women, that is, nearly one every day, were murdered by their partners in Germany; on the other hand, sexism is viewed as a stronger problem among the others. Women become a plaything of right nationalists to legitimize and support their racist ideas of the “outside”³² non-white group. That is a colonial tradition that can still be observed today.

ENDNOTES

¹ Fanon (2002, 285).

² Fanon (2002, 285). Original in French: “Fainéants-nés, menteurs-nés, voleurs-nés, criminels-nés.”

³ For a definition of hegemonic and subordinated masculinities, see, for example, Connell and Messerschmidt (2005, 832).

⁴ See Lucien Lévy-Bruhl (1922).

⁵ On the issue of French colonial violence and fears of the colonized, see also Vann (2012).

⁶ On this question, see the Chapter “Blistering Sands: Brutality and Manhood in Colonial Algeria, 1830-1848” of Dana Drew Irwin’s (2013) dissertation.

⁷ On this image in postcolonial France, see Macey (1998).

⁸ Aubin (1954, 292).

⁹ Porot and Arrii (1932, 589). Original in French: “Plus modestement, nous voudrions ici rechercher les raisons d’un phénomène vraiment particulier à cette race: la fréquence de l’impulsivité criminelle. C’est un fait qui frappe, au premier abord, que la proportion considérable des attentats, dans les statistiques judiciaires, et nous pouvons dire que les neuf dixièmes des expertises indigènes confiées aux psychiatres d’outre-mer ont trait à des meurtres ou des tentatives de meurtre. L’indigène joue de la matraque, du couteau ou des armes à feu avec une facilité, une promptitude et une sauvagerie qui entraînent le plus souvent la mort. Ce sont, très souvent, les proches parents, père, mère, frère et surtout femme qui sont frappés et, dans un certain nombre d’affaires, on compte plusieurs victimes de la fureur impulsive du meurtrier.”

¹⁰ Kocher (1883, 20f). Original in French: “Nous sommes bien loin de vouloir excuser l’Arabe, mais nous ne pouvons que remarquer que ce qui pour nous est un crime monstrueux, n’est pour lui qu’une action bien naturelle: le viol dans le mariage avec toutes ses brutalités, pour n’en citer qu’un exemple.”

¹¹ See, for example, McCulloch (2000).

¹² Fanon (2002, 285).

¹³ Berthelien (2006, 77).

¹⁴ See, for example, Dorer and Marschik (2006, 24); Kirchhoff (2010, 85-91).

¹⁵ Claudia Wolf (2006, 121, ff).

¹⁶ Kress and van Leeuwen (1996, 1).

¹⁷ Van Leeuwen and Jewitt (2001, 4ff).

¹⁸ Kress and van Leeuwen (1996, 8).

¹⁹ Ibid., 48.

²⁰ Wolf (2005, 138).

²¹ Ibid.

²² Ibid., 47.

²³ Original in German: "Frauen klagen an."

²⁴ Original in German: "Nach den Sex-Attacken von Migranten."

²⁵ Original in German: "Sind wir noch tolerant oder schon blind?"

²⁶ Original in German: "EXKLUSIV - Was in der Kölner Nacht wirklich geschah."

²⁷ Sander (2016).

²⁸ Original in German: "Nach den Sex-Attacken von Migranten: Sind wir noch tolerant oder schon blind?"

²⁹ Informationsgemeinschaft zur Feststellung der Verbreitung von Werbeträgern e.V., Auflage Süddeutsche Zeitung, Titel Nr: 1221, 3rd quarter 2016.

³⁰ Die TV-Berichterstattung in ARD und ZDF über die Silvesternacht 2015 & 16 in Köln, 8.

³¹ Original in Polish: "Islamski Gwałt Na Europie."

³² Bundeskriminalamt (2015, 15).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Aubin, Henri. "Indigènes Nord-Africains (Psychopathologie des)." In Manuel alphabétique de psychiatrie clinique et thérapeutique, edited by Antoine Porot, 292. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1954.
- Berthelier, Robert. "Fanon, psychiatre encore et toujours." VST – Vie Sociale et Traitements, No 89 (2006): 76-84.
- Bundeskriminalamt. Partnerschaftsgewalt. Wiesbaden: Bundeskriminalamt, 2015.
- Connell, Raewyn W. and James Messerschmidt. "Hegemonic Masculinity: Rethinking the Concept." Gender and Society 19, no. 6 (December 2005): 829-59.
- Dorer, Johanna and Matthias Marschik. Medien und Migration. Repräsentationen und Rezeption des „Fremden“ im europäischen Kontext. Medienimpulse, 2006.
- Drüeke, Ricarda. "Die TV-Berichterstattung in ARD und ZDF über die Silvesternacht 2015/16 in Köln." Berlin: Heinrich-Böll-Stiftung, 2016.

- Fanon, Frantz. Les damnés de la terre. Paris: La Découverte & Syros, 2002.
- Irwin, Dana Drew. "Revolutionary Histrionics: Violence and the Creation of Bourgeois Masculinity in Post-Napoleonic France, 1815-1848." PhD diss., Emory University, 2013.
- Kirchhoff, Susanne. Krieg mit Metaphern. Mediendiskurse über 9/11 und den „War on Terror.“ Bielefeld: Transcript Verlag, 2010.
- Kocher, Adolphe. "De la criminalité chez les Arabes au point de vue de la pratique médico-judiciaires en Algérie." Med. thesis, University of Lyon, 1883.
- Krass, Gunther and Theo Van Leeuwen. Reading Images: The Grammar of Visual Design. London: Psychology Press, 1996.
- Lévy-Bruhl, Lucien. La mentalité primitive. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1922.
- Macey, David. "The Algerian with the Knife." Parallax 4, no. 2 (1998): 159-67.
- McCulloch, Jock. Black Peril, White Virtue. Sexual Crime in Southern Rhodesia, 1902-1935. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2000.
- Porot, Antoine and Don Côme Arrii. "L'impulsivité criminelle chez l'indigène algérien. Ses facteurs." In Annales Médico-Psychologiques. 14th Series, Vol. 2, 90th Year, 588-611, 1932.
- Sander, Lalon. "Titel der Schande. Die Tageszeitung." January 9, 2016. Accessed March 1, 2017. <http://www.taz.de/!5267901/>.
- Van Leeuwen, Theo and Carey Jewitt. "Introduction." In Handbook of Visual Analysis, edited by Theo Van Leeuwen and Carey Jewitt. London and Thousand Oaks: Sage, 2001.
- Vann, Michael G. "Fear and Loathing in French Hanoi: Colonial White Images and Imaginings of 'Native' Violence." In The French Colonial Mind: Violence, Military Encounters, and Colonialism. Part 2, edited by Martin Thomas, 52-76. Lincoln and London: University of Nebraska Press, 2012.
- Wolf, Claudia M. Bildsprache und Medienbilder: Die Visuelle Darstellungslogik von Nachrichtenmagazinen. Wiesbaden: Springer VS, 2006.